COLUMBIA, S.C. (AP) - A new year of formation for the Air Force Security Forces at Langley Air Force Base, Va., has brought some new protocols to keep the force from mingling with local residents in the surrounding community. Langley Air Force Base is home to the 76th Fighter Wing. (Photo/Master Sgt. Tony Muenitz, U.S. Air Force) The Air Force set up a security perimeter around the base's main gate to restrict access to military personnel and vehicles.

Along with restricting the perimeter, the Air Force Security Forces has addressed the new year with training to avoid intermingling with the local community. In August 2014, a trespassing, suspected drug-related, incident at the base drew national media attention and community concern. Officials insist the training is working. "We really want to make sure that we kind of address everyone's concerns about making sure our security forces protect our personnel and assets," said 1st Sgt. Robert Gorrell, Langley AFB combatant command operations security officer. "Right now our numbers are greater than they have been in years, which is good. But we want to make sure that we're one hundred percent educated on the new procedures and on the new initiatives that we're pushing through." The first week of training was informal, or the "ground rules," with an emphasis on teaching officials from multiple levels, to communicate with the public and address concerns. The end of the formal training period, or the "first flush," included three days of training and interaction with the local community, said Gorrell. The
