Digital darkroom A digital darkroom enables users to create images by combining, manipulating, and coloring the pixels in an image. From a technical standpoint, the digital darkroom enables you to perform all the tasks of the traditional darkroom, but the primary purpose of the digital darkroom is to create _digital images_ of the negatives, prints, and slides from a film scanner.

Digital images are a convenient replacement for slides and negatives because they are available digitally and don't require development. You can create the same exact negative as the one captured on film in a darkroom, or you can create unique images that can't be produced in the darkroom using Photoshop. Other conveniences include the ability to retouch and color your photographs, create panoramic and perspective images, copy images, and so on. The ability to create an image from scratch is advantageous for a number of reasons. You can focus on the details and visual appeal of a particular scene or person. You can create interesting effects for a particular image. For example, you can create a blurry effect, such as a close-up of a face, or use a filter to add a filter to the background. You can use a photo effect to create an eerie, out-of-focus effect. And you can create a mosaic or collage effect, such as putting an image on another image. With these effects, you can give a professional appearance to your work. In this book, you'll learn how to perform a number of darkroom tasks that you can add to your editing.

Age and gender variations in glucose and insulin responses to an oral glucose challenge in children and adolescents with cystic fibrosis. Paediatric cystic fibrosis (CF) is associated with impaired glucose tolerance (IGT) and insulin resistance (IR). The aim of this study was to compare insulin and glucose responses to an oral glucose tolerance test (OGTT) in a paediatric CF cohort across different age groups. A cross-sectional study was performed using a single OGTT in a heterogeneous population of children and adolescents with CF. A total of 58 patients (37 males) with an age range of 6-17 years completed the study. There were four age groups: aged 6-8, 9-11, 12-14 and 15-17 years. Homeostasis model assessment of insulin resistance (HOMA-IR) and Matsuda insulin sensitivity (Matsuda ISI) indices were calculated. Glucose and insulin responses were measured using a commercially available kit. The youngest age group (age 6-8 years) was observed to have the highest HOMA-IR and Matsuda ISI indices, showing an increased IR compared to other age groups. The 15-17-year-old group also demonstrated a significantly higher HOMA-IR index compared to all other age groups. Male patients in the 15-17-year-old age group had a significantly higher HOMA-IR index compared to their female counterparts. In contrast, female patients showed a significantly higher Matsuda ISI index compared to males in all age groups except the oldest. The older CF patients have more significant IR compared to younger patients. Insulin resistance is more pronounced in patients ≥ 15 years of age and females. From here to there and on to somewhere September 2, 2012 Summer cruise, anyone? It doesn't look so bad, but for those of us who live in the Deep South, this is approaching the time when the outside temperatures start to feel kind of chilly. We generally get a few autumnal flurries every year, but the last couple have been more like fountains. And that's mostly because the first frost has passed. I don't remember last year being quite so late. However, we did have a cool but lovely summer. It is kind of hard to put into words what I'm looking forward to about fall. Some friends have prepared a list, and it is quite a mix.

later to the age of ninety the younger no more. As a youth and a young man he had worked and made good and kept himself going. When he had married he had been quite young and had contented himself with her. But she had borne two children, each girl, and he had been engrossed in his work, and it had not been his fault. She had not complained; she had borne those children with her husband's interest, and with her husband's help, for she was too good for that; and she had lived on in a contentment that had lasted twenty-five years. He had done his duty by her, and been a good husband and a good father. Now he had nothing to live for. And he had thought of her day after day. He was ill and needed medical aid. He had come to her, crying. But she could not hear. He heard her poor little boy crying in the night. And then he could stand it no longer, and he went to her. She had told him to go away. She was sorry. "I don't want to go," he said. He was trying to make her understand. She had taught him to obey his mother. But she had asked him to go away and not to disturb her. He had obeyed her, but this very morning she had taken him on her knee and kissed him. She had not been able to refuse. He had been sitting by her, and his little daughters had run to him, and she had broken the news to him. He could not bear to think of it. "It's all right," he had said. He had taken her in his arms and kissed her hair and then her cheek; and she had turned her head and laid it against his breast. And then he had left her to see to the children, and he had gone away, and been very miserable. "Good-bye, mother!" he said. The dusk was coming in. The sun went down, and over the dim hills showed faintly. The air was growing cold. And the rain came; it came in torrents. He went out and had the water off his small garden. And he stood there, looking out into the grey distance. "I shall go to London, mother," he said. "I shall live there for a time, and then I shall live
